Are they the same thing? A: DLLs are run-time code that can be loaded dynamically at run-time and provides functions to the process that uses them. Mostly they are used for code that is needed by multiple processes but not all of them have a dedicated process. An Application is the GUI and the code that provides the user interface. Usually the code that provides the user interface is an Application and the code that is needed for the GUI is a DLL. A Win32 application is typically an Application that was compiled for Win32, thus the architecture of the code is based on the 32bit x86 (or the 64bit amd64) processor family. The.exe file extension is usually used to identify a Win32 application. A: dll are used for code that is loaded dynamically at run time by a process. An application is the gui for an application and is normally compiled to be a exe. A: A dll is just a file. The difference is the way it is loaded. An exe is an executable file which represents a running program. A dll is similar to an exe, except that it is used to share code among multiple programs. Note that the above are all true of programs, and that dll's are just one kind of program. So, an exe could have a dll in it.
